

Core Idea

A volunteer board with matchmaking and engagement mechanics

- Two different profiles for employers and employees
 - Location and Social APIs (google maps and linkedin cv import)
- Matching service:
 - Questionnaire when setting up profile which asks for your prior experience, certifications, interests, expectations etc. which feeds into a potential match algorithm.
 - Server side algo to screen candidates on the employer side.
- Points system and/or badging system:
 - We want to integrate a progress tracking aspect in the form of a points and badges system.
 - Points are collected based on amount of volunteering work done and employer review. Sponsors can offer rewards that can be claimed using points.
 - Badges (inspired by GitHub) earned for milestones (e.g. x amount of hours done, etc.)
- Individual and Community impact summaries over a time period:
 - We want people to track their own individual progress as a social contributor, but we also want to help them recognise their work as a part of a larger community effort.

- At the end of a specified period, we will provide summaries (in a way inspired by Spotify wrapped) that let our users know how they, and other people like them, have helped certain causes.
 - For example:
 - You were one of x amount of people contributing to y cause/organisation, helping achieve z outcome
- Differentiation
 - One of the biggest competitors in this space is Do-it, which has operated since 2002 with 34,000+ charities and over a million volunteers, but a closer look reveals clear gaps our platform addresses.
 - Do-it is primarily a search and listings board — matching is geographic and keyword-based with no skill-based algorithmic matching
 - No volunteer-facing progression system — their analytics and ESG tools are aimed at corporates and charities, not individual volunteers
 - "Volunteering wallets" (personal records of volunteering history) are cited by Do-it as a future aspiration - we deliver this as a core feature from day one
 - No gamification or engagement loop — no badges, points, or rewards to encourage volunteers to return and develop
 - Our platform doesn't compete with Do-it on volume. Instead we target the engagement and retention problem they leave unsolved - getting volunteers to stay, progress, and keep coming back, which is increasingly important given the decline in volunteering participation since the pandemic.